KSE 100 KSE 100 Index

PSX · DAILY

Close · Mon 27 Jul 2026: 178262.33 · +4.23% vs prior session (2026-07-24) · index back at a resistance zone that has rejected it twice before, with the next move framed as breakout or retest.

THE SETUP

The analyst frames this as the KSE-100 Index arriving once again at the resistance zone of 178,000 to 179,500, a band the index has already been turned back from twice before. The chart, in the analyst's read, now poses a binary question at this same zone: does the index finally clear it, opening a path toward the 188,000 level the analyst identifies, or does the zone hold a third time, sending the index back down to retest the 169,800 support level the analyst names. Nothing beyond this framing is asserted; the setup is the zone itself and the two outcomes the analyst lays out from it.

LEVELS IN FOCUS

Key resistance zone — 178,000-179,500
The zone the analyst identifies as having rejected the index twice before; a decisive close above it, not a first touch, is what the analyst frames as a breakout

Breakout target — 188,000
The level the analyst identifies as the path opened if the resistance zone is cleared

Current test — at the zone
Where the index sits, at the resistance zone the analyst is watching

Retest support level — 169,800
The level the analyst identifies as the retest zone if the index is rejected from resistance again

WHAT TECHNICIANS WATCH FROM HERE

- 178,000 to 179,500 is the resistance zone the analyst is watching: a decisive close above it, rather than an intraday touch, is the distinction the analyst draws for a breakout.
- 188,000 is the level the analyst identifies as the path that could open if the resistance zone is cleared; it becomes a relevant reference only after that clearance.
- 169,800 is the support level the analyst names for a pullback: whether the index holds there or breaks through on a renewed rejection from resistance is what the retest scenario asks.
- A rejection from the 178,000-179,500 zone for a third time is the alternative the analyst frames; how the index behaves on this test relative to the prior two is the observation, not a forecast.

GENERAL CONCEPT · EDUCATION, NOT A VIEW ON THIS STOCK

Index at Resistences Zone

A resistance zone is a price band where an asset has previously struggled to advance beyond, often because sellers have stepped in at that level in the past. When price returns to a zone that has already rejected it more than once, technicians pay close attention because the level has demonstrated repeated significance. Two outcomes are generally considered at such a point. The first is a decisive breakout, where price closes convincingly above the zone rather than simply touching it intraday, which technicians treat as a stronger signal than a brief poke through the ceiling. The second is another rejection, where price fails at the same band and reverses lower, often toward the nearest support level below, which is a price area where buying interest has previously emerged. Neither outcome is guaranteed by the zone's existence alone; the technique is about identifying where the decision point lies and what would confirm each scenario, not about predicting which one occurs.